

REAL PEOPLE, REAL SOLUTIONS

Ranch with a Lake View

or their vacation retreat along a Northwoods chain of lakes, Jean and Rae Payne envisioned something rustic and western — like the homes they fell in love with during visits to Wyoming and Colorado.

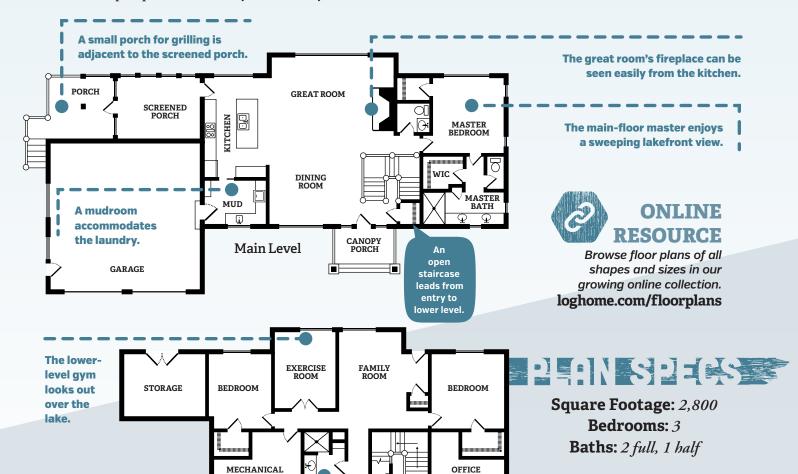

Why a log home: Rae and Jean began their search with a full-log home in mind. They eventually chose a half-log house that would give them the look they wanted, but have the sort of upkeep with which they were already familiar.

An office allows the Paynes to work from home when needed.

Most important features: "We wanted our home to be rustic, but not an over-the-top 'cabin,'" Jean explains. With their sloped lakefront lot, they knew they wanted the main living areas to be on one floor, with plenty of windows to take advantage of the view. For Jean, a kitchen that was open to the rest of the home was a must.

Two guest rooms share a bathroom.

The Inside Scoop

For some log home devotees, only full-log walls will do. For others, a half-log (log siding) house is a desirable option that provides a familiar maintenance routine and highly insulated walls. Wisconsin Log Homes recommends that homeowners re-stain their log siding and touch-up caulking every few years. Intrigued by log siding? Keep these points in mind:

■ Style options abound. Log siding is available in a wide variety of profiles. You can choose a rounded look - complete with chinking if that's your preference or a flatter profile. You also can choose from a range of exterior log corner styles.

- Bring it inside. If you line your interior walls with log siding as well, you'll create a full-log look for your home.
- Mix it up. Many of Wisconsin Log Homes' clients who use log siding outside choose a mix of drywall and wood accents like log posts and beams on the interior. Stone finishes add even more texture.